In the course of my publishing career, I've been (among other things) a word processor, a copy editor, a technical editor, a project editor, an acquisitions editor, and an author. Given that experience, I would hope that I have some perspective on how much collaborative effort goes into every book published.

I would like to thank my agent, Lynn Haller, of Studio B, for putting me in contact with Wiley and seeing the contract negotiation phase of this project through painlessly. At Wiley, my thanks go to Jody Lefevre, my initial acquisitions editor, for working with me again and for giving me the opportunity to write this book. Jenny Watson took over as my acquisitions editor and has been very helpful along the way. Many thanks go to Lynn Northrup, my project editor, for her graceful encouragement and useful comments. Daniel Hodge, the technical editor, contributed many insightful comments that helped make the book better and prevented a good number of errors from making it to print. Kim Heusel, the copy editor, provided ample proof that every writer needs an editor (including writers who are also editors), clarifying my prose and figuring out what I really meant to say.

My heartfelt thanks go to my daughters, for their ability to creep about the house on tiptoe and not bother dad when he was writing, and for their patience, support, and understanding. My wife also deserves special thanks, not only for her patience, support, and understanding, but also for her valuable professional advice as a writer and editor.

Lastly, thanks go to Fletcher, my dog, who kept me company and provided me with material for some of the samples in this book.
